

Kelly Blynn is a youth climate change advocate from the United States, and the co-founder of the international grassroots climate campaign, 350.org. She graduated from Middlebury College in Vermont in 2007 with a joint degree in Geography and Environmental Studies, though the majority of her education came from outside the classroom. In college, she co-founded the Sunday Night Group, one of the nation's most active campus environmental organizations, which successfully committed the college to becoming carbon neutral by 2017.. Since graduating, she has worked with author and environmentalist Bill McKibben, and a small team of friends from university to influence national U.S. policy on climate change. The projects they have worked on are Climate Summer, a 5-day march to raise awareness during the Presidential elections, Step It Up 2007, called the largest environmental protest in the U.S. in a generation, and now on to 350.org, a campaign designed to influence the outcome of the international climate treaty in Copenhagen at the end of 2009. At 350.org she wears many hats – the coordination of outreach in Latin America and the Caribbean, translation of the website, materials development, and artistic engagement. She lives in San Francisco and loves playing ultimate Frisbee.
